The NDSU Grain Drying and Storage website (<http://www.ag.ndsu.edu/graindrying>) has a link to a fan selection program. With the program, you can determine the fan size needed to obtain the desired airflow or the airflow provided by an existing fan.

Hellevang also recommends high-temperature drying if the wheat moisture content exceeds 17 percent. However, use caution because high temperatures affect the chemical structure and milling quality of the grain.

A common practice of some millers is to test a sample of the grain for milling properties before purchasing. High temperatures can damage baking quality severely even though the grain kernels appear undamaged.

Allowable dryer temperatures will vary with dryer type and design. However, a general recommended maximum drying air temperature for milling wheat in a cross-flow dryer where some of the wheat approaches the drying air temperature is 150 degrees for 16 percent moisture content and 130 degrees for 20 percent moisture content wheat.

Frequently, a plenum air temperature about 30 degrees warmer is used in dryers where the kernel temperature remains below plenum temperature and the wheat kernel is not damaged. Also, drying wheat will be slower than corn drying due to the reduced air temperature and airflow rate.

Last night, I did that thing where you have 30 minutes between work and day care pickup to power shop the grocery store and restock the essentials while planning a week's worth of meals in your head because the list you have on hand only says "eggs and milk," but the list in your head screams, "You're all going to be living off of Daddy's secret stash of ramen noodles if I put this grocery shopping trip on the back burner one more day..."

So yeah, I did that thing where I hang out between the canned beans and the pickles and text my husband about the level of our flour supply and he texts back that

Veeder

I should pick up some whiskey. And then I check the time and power walk through the cereal and freezer sections, throwing in a couple pizzas for good measure on my way to the checkout with a cart so full I have to hold the big family-sized box of frozen lasagna under one arm like a spectacle of the failed ranch wife and mother I've become.

And even though I had to take out a second mortgage on the house to pay the bill, I somehow managed to forget the most urgent of my husband's requests: dog food and whiskey. But I'm proud to say, when it came to toilet paper and ranch dressing, my Midwestern country living instincts didn't let me down, because, well, girlfriend don't want to be stranded...

But I think those instincts are also to blame for the reason I brought home my fourth box of Minute Rice for the pantry shelves that currently house 17 jars of mayo, bags and bags of dry beans we've never ever cooked with in our entire lives, a bigger noodle selection than the Olive Garden and enough oatmeal to feed a branding crew if we were facing down the apocalypse.

Oh, and because I'm always inspired by the beautiful produce aisle and my snug-fitting jeans, I decided I'm going to start eating healthier, once and for all. So I bought a giant container of mixed greens for all of the salads in my future... Mind you, that was before the aforementioned panicked, time-crunched walk through the freezer section for last-minute chicken nuggets, but I digress.

Because after I got all of my wares and two toddlers into the house in a record-breaking (and arm-breaking, and back-breaking) two trips, I realized I must have had that same salad conversation with myself last time I was at the grocery store when I discovered the same exact container of mixed greens sitting untouched in my produce drawer.

So I did what every goal-oriented and focused career woman, wife and mother of two would do when faced with that moment of clarity - I poured us all big bowls of Peanut Butter Crunch for supper, called my sister to see if she could use some fresh lettuce and called it a day.

Because there's always tomorrow, and tomorrow we're having salad... and dry beans... and Minute Rice...

Prices keep rising, but lives are still cheap

By Lloyd Omdahl

Columnist

There is little doubt that we are seeing a universal rise in prices. Nevertheless, lives are getting cheaper as society continues to tolerate deadly public policy, usually in exchange for money and power.

For several years, we have failed to attack gun deaths with any degree of commitment. After every mass slaughter, policymakers are outraged about gun violence and promise to find the silver bullet that will end the problem tomorrow morning.

The outrage soon melts away and remains latent until the next group of school children are cut down with an assault weapon designed for that purpose. Assault weapons are okay but kids should not be in schools.

Our silver bullet at the present time is a "red flag" law that will permit law enforcement to ask a judge whether or not it would be okay to take guns away from someone they suspect may do self or others harm. Seventeen states have passed "red flag" laws with success determined by time, resources and commitment of local law enforcement.

"Generally speaking, human life is too important to be treated so cheaply."

Because they are difficult to administer, the "red flag" laws get a mixed review. They are not the silver bullets some hoped but they are going to save a few lives. But a few lives are cheap.

The last session of the North Dakota Legislature considered a bipartisan "red flag" law but it was killed in the House of Representatives by a vote of 76-17. The word "considered" is ill-used. With that kind of vote, it didn't even enter most legislators' minds. Life is so cheap that North Dakota can afford to lose a few people.
